Mercury in Coal and Mercury Emissions from Coal Combustion By Robert B. Finkelman Abstract Mercury emissions from coal-fired electric generating utilities are a major uncontrolled source of mercury in the environment. This mercury may be contributing to serious health problems in segments of our society. The USGS is compiling information on mercury in coal that may be useful in developing strategies for reducing mercury emissions from coal use. The USGS coal-quality database contains information on mercury concentrations in more than 7,000 coal samples. Detailed geochemical analysis has helped to determine that mercury in coal is commonly associated with pyrite, but other modes of occurrence may be locally important. Physical coal cleaning removes, on average, 37 percent of the mercury. Characterization-Figure 8. Four Corners coal-fired electrification power plant near Farmington, N. Mex. Emissions from such power plants that use coal combustion of feed coal and its combustion byproducts is helping to further fuel are under study as sites of potential mercury contamination to better understand the behavior of mercury in utility boilers. local and regional environments. mercury in coal is about 0.2 g/g (micrograms/gram); values exceeding 1 g/g are rare. On an equal energy basis, the highest mercury concentrations are found in the Gulf Coast lignites (36-120 lb of Hg/10 Btu), and the Hams Fork region coal (120 lb of Hg/10 Btu) since the passage of the 1990...
